The Janus kinase/signal transducers and activators of transcription (JAK/STAT) pathway is one of a handful of pleiotropic cascades used to transduce a multitude of signals for development and homeostasis in animals, from humans to flies. In mammals, the JAK/STAT pathway is the principal signaling

Overview of Jak/STAT Signaling Pathway The Jak/STAT pathway is a putative intracellular signaling pathway that mediates the effects of a large number of cytokines and growth factors. These compounds generally bind to receptors that lack intrinsic kinase activity and thus utilize intracellular enzymes to initiate downstream signaling.

JAK-STAT Signaling - University of Washington

JAK-STAT Signaling. Cytokines are regulatory molecules that coordinate immune responses. The most typical cytokine receptor is a protein that forms a stable association with a cytoplasmic tyrosine kinase known as a Janus Kinase, or JAK, for short.

JAK mediated phosphorylation of Stat enables Stat dimerization, through reciprocal interaction of each Stat SH2 domain, followed by nuclear translocation and DNA binding (Aaronson and Horvath, 2002). JAKs in turn are activated by transient phosphorylation of a number of tyrosine residues ( Khwaja, 2006 ).
